1. Explain how affective factors will influence language learning. Discuss the pedagogical implications of your explanation. (25%)
2. Describe three possible factors that will threaten the reliability of a test and give examples. (25%)
3. Cognitive development is also intellectual growth. It involves the methods that children use to organize, store, and retrieve information. The reception of new stimuli is thereby not a passive process but involves active interpretation and organization. Given that the levels of cognitive growth vary between third and fifth graders, discuss how teaching activities, instructional goals, instructional materials, and assessment should differ to be better aligned with children's predetermined phases of cognitive development. (25%)
4. Compare and contrast learner-centered instruction and teacher-centered instruction in aspects of theoretical rationale, teaching objectives, classroom procedures, the role of the teacher, and instructional materials. (20%)
Also discuss the applications and implications of these two teaching methods for teaching English to young learners in EFL classrooms of Taiwan. (5%)
